Concerning The Honest Man

"If there were no honesty, it would be invented as a means of getting wealth," wrote the brilliant statesman, Mirabeau. Honest men and honest methods are plentiful. There is no need either to discover the one or invent the other. But imagine a man making the quest for honesty; where would he go to find it? Though one may be a thousand leagues from the confession of a faith, he will make his quest with fine discernment among men and women of religious culture, for he knows that the Bible and the church erected upon it scorn deception and foster honesty. Remove from the world's work the men and women whom the church has inspired, and it would collapse tomorrow. Amos Lawrenson had a text of scripture inscribed upon his purse, and nearly all big business is having the church legend "HONESTY" stamped upon its conscience. Three-fourths of all uplift is conducted by members of churches. The church has never claimed that honesty has been entirely free from alloy. In this respect it is like coin. But the dishonest churchman is occasional; he never feels at home there, and once discovered, is self removed. This unworthy minority, pitied by some as "good men gone wrong," are generally acknowledged as "bad men found out." Notwithstanding these exceptions, there is no thinking man today willing to deny the pre-eminence of the church as the creator and conserver of essential honesty. It is therefore incumbent upon every one who shares the benefits of honesty-and that includes us all-to encourage the church in its splendid achievement in making men and methods honest.

The church effects its work by a very simple method. It begins with human life at the beginning. It values the watch more by its works than by its glittering case. It does not purify the well by whitewashing the pump. The orchard receives attention at the roots as well as in the foliage. The superiority of the church lies in the thoroughness of its work. It begins with the tendrils of thought, controls the act, molds the habit until it flowers into character; and its initial ef-
